In February of 2002 I took my first assignment as a caregiver for an elderly lady with COPD and diabetes. I quickly discovered that, for me, care giving to the elderly was not a job but a calling. I was soon looking forward to the time we spent together and the thing I enjoyed most is how she would relate to me her life long experiences. Over the years I've found that the conversations I've had with my elderly companions stand out as one of the most enjoyable times for both of us. Even Alzheimer's patients have enriched my life with stories from their long term memories, and sharing their daily life is a source of strength and full of laughter.

Over time my compassion and love for these special people brought me in contact with other caregivers and those interested in becoming caregivers. Many were just interested in a job but a few, like myself, also had that that inner calling for a true vocation in caring for the elderly. In addition, word-of-mouth caused me to become a point of contact when elderly people or their families began searching for possible caregivers. I soon found I had a gift for discerning good fits between potential caregivers and elderly people in need of services.

After ten years of dedicating myself to both providing care and helping others find the most optimum solution to their needs, it became clear that I could best serve the senior community by focusing on: identifying dedicated care givers; insuring those caregivers have adequate training and support; and, matching the caregiver talents and gifts to individual needs. As a result of this decision I have gathered together a community of those caregivers that meet my demanding standards and have established Amazing Care to provide the best quality care possible based on love and compassion and a true reverence for the elderly.
